Wollten Sie schon immer mal hinter die Kulissen des grossen Kinoklassikers schauen, der vor 50 Jahren das erste Mal über amerikanische Leinwände flimmerte? Sarah Gristwood hat mit Paramount Pictures in Archiven gewühlt und bisher nie veröffentlichte Fotos, Dokumente und Skizzen zu Tage gefördert. So erfährt man auch, dass Autor Truman Capote eigentlich Marilyn Monroe für die Hauptrolle vorgesehen hatte, der die Rolle aber zu anrühlich war.

Always wanted to take a backstage look at the great movie classic that first came to America's silver screens some 50 years ago? Sarah Gristwood has delved into the archives at Paramount Pictures and emerged with a host of previously unpublished photos, sketches and other documents on the film and its making. Gristwood's book is packed with intriguing insights – like the fact that Truman Capote, author of the novella on which the movie was loosely based, had originally wanted Marilyn Monroe to play the lead, but she found the part too offensive.

Travelling in a wheelchair, using a walker or with a similar mobility restriction can be a frustrating affair: not all of the world's cities have been designed (or revised) to facilitate access for the physically challenged. The problems posed can be similarly daunting for families with buggies or strollers. Sarah Fuller has been looking into the matter more closely in her home city of Hong Kong ever since her own father became wheelchair dependent. And she's found over 100 hotels that are disabled-accessible, more than 370 restaurants and a wide range of easy-access sightseeing and shopping attractions. Sarah's book also offers numerous hints and tips on local public transport, together with suggestions for relaxing day excursions. All in all, it's a great guide that will hopefully soon be available in other languages and for many further cities, too.
